Wpf listbox itemtemplate binding example. Wpf listbox itemtemplate binding isselected.

A very common usage scenario for a ListView to have columns, sometimes (for example, in WinForms) referred to as a detail view. The data binding process happens automatically once we assign the list to ItemsSource property of ListView, but the result is a little discouraging: Each user is represented by its type name in ListView. This article has been fully translated into the following languages: ChinAs DanamqrqAs Franc Alem Italiano Portuguese Spanish Vietnamese Aren't on the list? For the e-mail address that we added to this example, underline it, we give it a blue color and change the mouse cursor, to make it behave like a hyperlink. SummaryUsing an ItemTemplate and data binding, we produce a very cool ListView control. The concept of data binding is explained in detail elsewhere in this tutorial, but in general terms it is a matter of separating data from the layout. We can use this to our advantage and replace the whole ToString(), to get a more meaningful solution. In this example, we will do a series of custom format on each item, just to show the flexibility that this makes the WPF ListView. Using the system; Using Using using System.Windows; WpfTutorialSamples.ListView_control namespace { ListViewItemTemplateSample partial public class Window { public ListViewItemTemplateSample() { InitializeComponent(); List Items = new List(); items.Add(new User() { Name = "Joã da Silva", Age = 42, Mail = "jo@doe-family.com" }); items.Add(new User() { Name = "Unknown", Age = 39, Mail = "jane@doe-family.com" }); items.Add(new User() { Name = "Sammy Doe", Age = 13, Email = "sammy.doe@gmail.com" }); } } public class User { public string Name { get; assembly; } Public int Age { get; assembly; } Mail public string { get; assembly; } We use multiple TextBox controls to create each item, where we place some of the text in bold. Fortunately, WPF makes it all very simple using templates. ListView with an ItemTemplateWPF has everything to do with templates, so specifying a data template for ListView is very easy. So let's try to bind some data to a ListView: using System; using System.Collections.Generic; using System.Windows; WpfTutorialSamples.ListView_control { public partial class ListViewDataBindingSample : Window { public ListViewDataBindingSample() { InitializeComponent(); List Items = new List(); items.Add(new User() { Name = "Joã da Silva", Age = 42 }); items.Add(new User() { Name = "Unknown", Age = 39 }); items.Add(new User() { Name = "Sammy Doe", Age = 13 }); } } public class User { public string Name { get; } Public int age { GET; set; } } We fill out a list of our own user objects, each user having a name and an age. Do you want a part of the text to be bold or another color? This is to be expected, because .NET does not have a clue about how you want your data to be displayed, so just calls the all of ToString() on each object and use this to represent the item. The WPF comes with a built-in display class to deal with this, we will speak in the next chapter. Maybe you want an image? Click here to help us translate this article to your language! The ListView control: In the previous article, we manually fill out a list control through the XAML code, but in WPF, it is all about data connection. However, it still seems very much like a list box. Try to overwrite the user class by this version: Public Class User { Public String Name { GET; to define; } Int int age { GET; to define; } Public substitution String String () {return this.name + "," + this.age + "years old"; } } This is a much more friendly display and will do well in some cases, but rely on a simple string is not so flexible. Flexible.
